One of the world's most significant events in musical circles in 2016 was the rediscovery of Igor Stravinsky's (1882–1971) lost composition, which went missing at the time when the composer was at the beginning of his career. Funeral Song was written in 1908 as a memorial tribute to the death of composer Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov, Igor Stravinsky's teacher and close friend. The piece was performed the first time in the following year, 1909, and then it was lost during the Russian Revolution. In the ensuing years, Stravinsky talked highly about this piece, referring to it as the precursor to his early masterpieces – the ballets The Firebird and The Rite of Spring, confident that it had to still exist somewhere in Saint Petersburg's archives. The search for the long-lost score lasted longer than a century, before it was fortuitously discovered in the archives of Saint Petersburg Conservatory. Its discovery and the new premiere in 2016 attracted the attention of the whole world. The piece is scored for a large, triple-cast symphony orchestra, with all the expressive possibilities that such an ensemble enables; it includes musical odes dedicated not only to Rimsky-Korsakov, but also to other great role models admired by the young composer – Mussorgsky and Wagner. Each of the instruments take turns to solemnly present the melancholic melody, like a moving procession placing wreaths on the tomb of the late teacher and composer. In the current concert season, the Belgrade Philharmonic Orchestra is one of the privileged orchestras which have been given exclusive right to include the Funeral Song in their repertoires for the first time in 2017 (the others being the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, the Orchestre national de France, the Czech National Symphony Orchestra and the Philharmonia Orchestra London).

Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky (1840–1893) began his work on the Piano Concerto No 1 in the winter of 1874. When he presented the work to his former mentor and a Moscow Conservatory teacher Nikolai Rubinstein, the two men had a fierce argument. Among other things, Rubinstein was primarily annoyed by the fact that the piece violated a few established rules of the genre and structure. The criticism often indicated his 'clumsy' proportions: the first movement was almost twice as long as the next two combined. The lush romantic melody that carved the concerto into the musical memory of the general population is presented at the very beginning, and never again. The lyric second movement is abruptly interrupted with a contrasting prestissimo section, simulating an inserted scherzo movement. However, the audience was not bothered by all these transgressions of composing rules and, shortly after the world premiere in Boston in 1875, when the solo was played by Hans von Bülow, the piece was included in the repertoires of many a renowned pianist, and has lived until the present day as Tchaikovsky's best known piano concerto. For years after the Boston premiere, Rubinstein had tried to repair the seriously damaged friendship with Tchaikovsky by subsequently including the piece in his repertoire and performing it until his death.

The third and final symphony by Sergei Rachmaninoff (1873–1943) was written 30 years after his previous composition of this genre, and was premiered in 1936. Although the critical reception was not warm, the composer was very proud of the piece, hoping that the world would come to understand it after a certain time and perceive all its merits. As if it were a prophecy, his wishes came true – 30 years after the unsuccessful premiere by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski, Symphony No 3 had its renaissance on the concert stages, which it still enjoys today. The work opens with a musical motto played by clarinets, French horns and cellos, which would return in each of the three movements and thus round off the composition. The second movement incorporates two opposing moods, delivered as two submovements – lyric and dancing. The finale is marked by Russian folk melodies and rhythms, which has brought the overall designation of the piece as Rachmaninoff's most expressively Russian symphony. This specific quality is exactly what lies in the heart of the Third Symphony, the piece that embodies the composer's nostalgia for the great Romantic era that seemed distant and forgotten in 1936, as well as the nostalgia for his homeland, which he was aware at that time that he had left forever.
